in the world

Yale Law School's reach extends to all corners of the world. Faculty research, write, and teach on issues of international importance. Students spend summers in countries far away, working on issues as varied as human rights, war crimes, refugee rights, environmental law, judicial reform, and exporting the rule of law. Members of the Law School community, our alumni included, share their expertise at major academic conferences around the world, or bring to the Law School some of the leading legal minds of the century to think through the opportunities and challenges brought by the increasingly globalized world we live in.
